In fact, the crowd had come out expecting to see a good game, and taking all things into consideration, the prospect was that it would not be disappointed. It had already been shown that Cornell has a strong team this year, and that its players are fully as alert and active and up to the fine points of the game as their rivals in the Eastern colleges.

Harvard was in no better trim than had been Princeton, to say the least. It was the general opinion when the rival teams came out to practice bettore the game that they were very evenly matched.

A large contingent of Harvard students had accompanied the eleven down from Cambridge and formed a noisy nucleus for the crimson rooters at one end of the grand stand. There were also prominent representatives of football interests present from Yale and Princeton, as both of these institutions were ton, as both of these institutions were anxious to take Harvard's measure, and this afternoon's game would give them an excellent opportunity.

The grand stand and covered benches were well-filled with spectators, and the bright weather had brought out the laddes in all their Fall finery. The ground was rather moist in spots after three days of rain, but everything had been done to overcome these disadvantages and insure the best conditions for good play.
